The current research examined patterns of behaviours, motivations, and reflections of motivation in a sample of 78 adults with a diagnosis of autism and ID. Despite a low mean level of autism severity, adults with autism displayed a wide range of "autistic traits", indicating that the disorder is not associated with a uniform presentation. Adults with autism self-reported the greatest intensity for social motivation, which they also described as the most "valuable" for their school experience. In contrast, adults with autism reported the lowest levels of motivation to seek out challenging learning situations or to obtain a better education. Behavioural observations revealed that adults with autism struggled with deficits in social behaviours that directly related to their social motivation, but they also appeared to seek out challenging learning situations in private. The implications of these findings for future research on motivation and social behaviours in autism are discussed.PROJECT SUMMARY Incontinence is a common, expensive, and potentially devastating problem affecting the lives of millions of people. It is particularly prevalent in older adults, creating a major financial burden for the health care system. See, e.g., Nankervis, T. The economic burden of urinary incontinence in the United States: results from a population-based study, 61 Menopausal Women?s J. 126-39 (2001). To date, no pharmaceutical drug to treat the condition is approved by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), and current interventions are associated with considerable side effects and low compliance. An optimal treatment for urinary incontinence would likely involve the delivery of bioengineered stem cells to the lower urinary tract. Stem cells are unique in their ability to f678ea9f9e
